Welcome to the Akha Language.

Akha is a Subject - Object - Verb arrangement language.

This script is set up so as to make the learning of written Akha as harmonious as possible with English spellings and pronunciations, since many Akha request to learn English also and both use the Roman script. English is seen as giving them some advantage as well as representation in being able to deal beyond Thailand with the outside world in regards to their human rights needs. We would add that in Thailand the Akha have very little political or human rights representation.

There is no remaining text of an Akha script from centuries ago if one originally did exist. The Akha refer to their written language as "Heart Book". Knowledge is heard and written directly in the heart for easy recital. Thus all Akha knowledge is committed to memory and recital. This script is not an attempt to suggest that this is inferior. If anything, "Heart Book" is superior to written books in many cases. Yet the Akha are being pushed into learning to read Thai, Burmese, Chinese. For this reason it seems reasonable that they have a useable script of their own. Previous to the development of this script, a number of Missionary sectarian scripts were in use, though not much writing was ever committed to them.

In this Akha script, all syllables are generally ended with “h” as this makes it clear where the tone markers will start next.

Most Akha words are constructed of two syllables.

Many Akha statements make use of an item classifier at the end, such as “seeh” for objects which are round. The language also use classifiers about the person’s thinking.

A speaker may attach a classifier which will tell why he states thus or so.

“I will not do that” plus a classifier for fear, “because I am afraid” or a classifier for illegal, “because it is illegal”.

In many cases the Akha will shorten a discussion of spoken words by using the first syllable of the first word, dropping nearly the entire discussion, and adding the last syllable, thus saying a mindful in almost a single word of two syllables. Conversations may speed up dramatically by this means of dropping out the middle, which is based on the assumption that the other party knows what is being spoken of in this context.

In the cases of speaking where the speakers do not want the other parties present to understand what is going on, a special language of ryme is used. There are several choices of this ryme, and the discussion is dispersed in this special language. Speakers may fade in and out of this special language, making some statements obscure, or speaking to a person in a different part of the hut about a private matter while talking to others.

The Akha may also pick different words based on the distance that they have to communicate to the listener, making the words easier to hear over greater distance.

Akha is also spoken simultaneously by many people, no one taking a turn, and can also be spoken in very low tones which are hardly audible and carry from hut to hut, the listener replying, in equally low tone, nearly unperceptible to the unskilled.

Listening is an integral part in the harmony of any village, knowing what is going on, who is saying what. That the speaker and listener are in remote huts does not matter.

It is impossible to protect a language while destroying a culture. The language carries with it the knowledge and references, the hopes and aspirations of the people. If the people are made to be ashamed of their culture, one can assume that the language becomes increasingly useless.

It has been the role of colonizers and expansionists, come in the form of missionaries, to destroy the culture of a people, in this case the Akha people. These missionaries often learn the language, make a few translations into it, solely for the purpose of carrying out their evil intent of destroying these people's culture and pulling as many of these people into their own religious community as possible. There is incredible financial and political power to be had in this process and so missions have been the political means by which this is accomplished through out the world, for their own gain, but also for the gain of the consumer economies of the west. Tribal people are told that their ways and means of living are not dependable, while the most valuable land is taken from them in an incredible lie that most evangelicals will steadfastly deny the missions play a role in.

If you look around Chiangrai Province in Thailand you will see incredible wealth of the evangelical missions, millions of dollars, all given by churches to help the poor. The poor never get it. The villages are as poor and without human rights as they ever were by gross comparison. The fat missionaries, mostly all white people, drive nice cars, have their kids in the best schools, eat well at all the fast food outlets, shop at the best stores, have health insurance and a place back in the west as well. Seldom do they ever even sleep in an Akha village.

There are many means and methods of this destruction, but they are chiefly based on presumed racial superiority. The destruction is often done as a reward for money. The result is that the knowledge of the elders, the historians of the society, is not readily passed down to the children who have been taught
